Mortgage rates are at their highest point in nearly three years as turmoil in the bond market continues.

U.S. Treasury bonds continued selling off on Thursday, driving yields on the most closely watched bonds to their highest levels since 2002.

The yield on the 10-year Treasury rose as high as 5.34% in early trading. The 30-year yield spiked to as high as 5.68%.

The surge in the 10-year yield is driving U.S. mortgage rates higher, too. Late Wednesday, the average 30-year fixed mortgage rate rose to 7.6%, the highest it has been since late 2023.

Yields are spiking for a number of reasons, but a major driver is inflation stemming from rising energy prices as a result of the wars in Iran and Ukraine.

With inflation still running hot, energy prices continuing to trend higher and yields rising, affordability still remains a major problem for consumers.

The rise in mortgage rates has put the American Dream further out of reach for millions of hopeful homeowners.
